Description

Prodigious Returns

A poem by Michael Hawkes

May 12, 2022

A father meets his son,

Whom he hasn't seen for years;

They settle on the sofa with some sandwiches and beers.

Father asks about the future,

About the young man's prospects,

His ambitions, hopes and fears.

The son enquires about the past,

About the things that didn't last,

About the many absences and various careers.

Thus their kindred spirits meet,

Their contrarities converge

To shape this fleeting moment, taken out of time

To be a moment of emergence,

Of abundance and completion,
In which temporal biographies inexorably combine.
To weave a common braided thread
That links the unborn to the dead,
Inextricably entangled in a hereditary line.
When time comes for them to part,
Both hearts are emptied yet replete,
With all that they had found to share,
Now disencumbered and complete
One moves toward the shadows
While the other greets the glare.
